

BODY CUPPING MASSAGE

By creating suction and negative pressure, this therapy release rigid soft tissue, drains excess fluids an toxins loosens adhesion, lifts connective tissues, and brings blood flow to stagnant skin and muscles.

You do not need to have any injury to receive a Cupping Therapy treatment.

Cups may be placed almost anywhere on the body.

For this treatment, I massage the client's problem area. Then I use cups in a gliding motion over that same area. I leave the cups still for up to 20 minutes. While those cups are in place, I massage (and optionally cup) other parts of the body. After that, I go back to the first cups and, if the marks are dark, I focus more on those spots before moving on with the rest of the treatment.

Cupping marks or discoloration happen when cups stay in one place. If you don't want those marks, but still want cupping therapy, just tell me—I'll keep the cups moving the whole time.

A big misconception about cupping is that the marks or discolorations it leaves are bruises. They're not bruises.

When cups stay in one spot for 5–20 minutes, they often produce noticeable marks. If instead I keep the cups moving, the marks are much lighter and don't last as long.

The suction of cupping pulls old, stagnant blood, fluid, and waste up to the skin surface, helping restore healthy circulation and heal the deeper tissues.

These marks show that stagnation—like dead blood, lymph, debris, or toxins—has been drawn out toward the surface.
